There are none of them less than 15 by 16, and have high ceilings, large transoms, and are abundantly lighted and ventilated. The guests in this fine hotel will never be uncomfortable from heat or cold. We can imagine no more delightful temperature for sleeping in midsummer than they will have who lodge in the Peyton House.

The architectural style of the building is admirable, and very creditable to the architect, J. C. Neilson, of Baltimore. West & Carroll, of Baltimore, are the builders, and of such artistic merit that I think he deserves this notice.

The timber of the building is all perfectly seasoned—the floors are as firm as if based on granite. That obtained in the neighborhood was sawed at the mill of Mr. G. G. Peterkin, and has had two years to season. The heavy timbers, such as sleepers and the flooring-plank, came from Georgia and North Carolina, and is mostly heart-pine. When Jefferson and Henry were pressing their plans for a system of education letters were exchanged between them and Washington; and the only difference of view expressed was that Washington thought that the University proposed should be national and seated at the Federal capital. As to the second suggestion that Mr. Jefferson may have been influenced by New England prepossessions rather than by personal conviction as to the wants of Virginia schools and an university where might be science useful in our times and country, and fanaticism, and indifferentism to their own State, which we now send our youth to bring from those of New England.

As to the religious instructions to be given in the schools, Jefferson, who was a great student of Montesquieu, only opposed sectarian and priestly teaching of dogmas. In his letter to Adams, this question was discussed on both sides and with special accord. Jefferson wrote: "The doctrines that flow from the lips of Jesus himself are within the comprehension of a child." It was with the universal accord of all parties in Virginia, Maryland, and every other one of the States that the public schools were opened with the reading of the New Testament and prayer.
